Queen Latifah is a woman who breaks barriers and defies categories. In every role she plays – from musician, actress and producer to foundation president, record label president and author – there is one commonality: she is true to herself. In that vein, this summer she is releasing her new book “Put on Your Crown: Life Changing Moments on the Path to Queendom” to help young women build a strong sense of self-esteem.

Raised Dana Owens in inner city Newark, today Queen Latifah is a one-woman brand that personifies her belief that contemporary women can be and do exactly what they set their mind to. She first came on the scene with a message of empowerment and self-acceptance as one of the first solo female rap artists.

“That I was true to myself, and that I wasn’t afraid to take chances and try new things. That I helped open some doors, showed some people that it can be done and inspired them to live their dreams.” - Queen Latifah

Since then she has inspired women as she has earned an Oscar nomination for her role as Mama Morton in “Chicago,” spoken out about being sexually abused as a young girl, acted as a plus-sized spokesmodel for Cover Girl and launched a cosmetic line for women of color.

Queen Latifah is also the author of the memoir and motivational book “Ladies First: Revelations of a Strong Woman” and the children’s book “Queen of the Scene.” A supporter of many charitable causes including women’s and children’s charities, she is the president of the Lancelot H. Owens Scholarship Foundation, established in memory of her brother for exceptional, but financially challenged, students.
